

What Safe Love Actually Feels Like

Learning to Recognise and Receive Goodness

"Love must be sincere." — Romans 12:9

KEY CONCEPTS

1 Familiar is not the same as safe

Your nervous system seeks what it recognises. If love in your experience has always involved highs and lows, intensity and withdrawal, you may find genuine stability underwhelming — or even frightening. This is not a preference. It's a trauma response. And it can change.

2 What safe love feels like in the body

Safe relationships feel different in the body — ease rather than anxiety, expansion rather than contraction, restfulness rather than hypervigilance. You breathe differently around safe people. Your jaw unclenches. You don't monitor their mood constantly. Learning to notice these body signals is how you stop repeating the pattern.

3 The Fruit of the Spirit as a compass

Galatians 5 gives us a relational compass: love, joy, peace, patience, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, gentleness, self-control. These are not just spiritual qualities — they are descriptions of what a safe person creates in the room. Start asking: how does my body feel after time with this person?

THIS WEEK'S PRACTICE

After your next significant interaction with someone, pause and ask: Do I feel more at ease or more on edge? More like myself or less? More energised or more depleted? Write it down. Let your body be the measure.

YOUR REFLECTION

'I am learning what safe love feels like. My body knows the difference, and I am learning to listen.'

YOUR NOTES & JOURNAL SPACE

WANT TO GO DEEPER?

The full community has an entire module on Healthy Relating with a Fruit of the Spirit Discernment Journal and a guided week on learning to receive care. Inside Reclaim Your Self at $27/month — come heal with us.

knownlovedcoaching.com | Reclaim Your Self Community — \$27/month